Narrative Description

(Describe the historic and current physical appearance and condition of the property. Describe contributing and noncontributing resources if applicable. Begin with a summary paragraph that briefly describes the general characteristics of the property, such as its location, type, style, method of construction, setting, size, and significant features. Indicate whether the property has historic integrity.)

Summary Paragraph

The Criglersville Elementary School property includes three historically intact buildings spread across almost six acres of idyllic countryside in rural Madison County. Situated just west of the Criglersville crossroads, the parcel includes portions of Old Blue Ridge Turnpike and a stretch of the Robinson River. The 17,855 square foot brick school building, constructed in 1949, is one of the earliest examples of modernist architecture in Madison County. It contains eight classrooms, two large hallways, bathrooms, a cafeteria, and a gym. The first school at Criglersville was constructed ca. 1913 and expanded in 1921. In ca. 1935, the home economics building, and the agriculture building were both added to the property to accommodate expanding programs and a growing student population. The current school building was constructed after a fire destroyed the earlier 1913 school. The home economics building and the agriculture building, both contributing resources, survived the fire and continued to be utilized for educational purposes even after the construction of the new larger school. The two wood-frame out buildings remain true to their historic roots, with the easternmost building housing the Madison County Historical Society's Mountain Museum. In addition to the museum, an easement covers the roadside monument dedicated to the individuals displaced during the creation of Shenandoah National Park.

Main School Building

Criglersville Elementary School faces southeast, fronting Old Blue Ridge Turnpike and a small, paved parking area. The school is a rectangular, two-story, 17,855-square-foot building that remains largely unchanged from its original construction and is an archetypal example of a Modernist style building. Constructed in 1949, its imposing, utilitarian design reflects the commitment to large-scale civic investment that defined the post-war period. Built to last, the school building remains a source of pride and nostalgia for the surrounding community.

Exterior

A testament to the beauty of symmetry, the rectangular building is constructed of brick with 54 massive metal windows with fixed panes surrounding functional metal casement windows. All eight of the building's entrances still house the wooden doors installed during the building's original construction, all but one of which are double doors designed to handle the substantial daily traffic inherent to use as an educational facility. On the front and sides of the structure, the flat roof is surrounded by a parapet wall, capped with concrete coping.

The building's front façade is divided into three sections, a centered projecting bay with two flanking classroom wings that extend out east and west from the main entry. Within the front projecting bay is a recessed front double door entry topped with a multi-light transom. Adorning the top of the centered section "Criglersville Elementary School" is spelled out in in aluminum lettering with a distinct modern font. The façade also features the original 29 aluminum windows spread across the first and second stories.

Only on the back are the building's asymmetrical elements obvious, including the exterior entrance to the internally sequestered boiler room and the towering brick chimney that stands above it. Both the boiler room and kitchen, found on opposite sides of the building's rear, are only one story tall and stand out in juxtaposition to the substantially taller gym and cafeteria that stands between them. No parapet is present at the buildings back, making the differing roof elevations obvious when observed from the building's rear elevation.

Interior

Inside, the building's aesthetic is archetypal and many of its original finishes and features remain well preserved. The main entry opens to a small lobby and provides access to a wide central corridor with painted cinder block walls and vinyl asbestos tile floors that run the length of the building's first floor. The wide corridor provides access on one side to three classrooms, the library, the principal's office, and the nurses office. On its other side, access to the gym, cafeteria, bathrooms, and stairs can be found. The stairs to the second floor are located at each end of the corridor. The second floor features a similar layout as the first floor with a hallway providing access to the five classrooms above. Set high on the corridor wall, across from the classrooms, are several sets of glass block windows providing additional light to the hallway.

Each of the building's classroom contains two mounted chalkboards and a wall-spanning row of handcrafted cabinets reflected in the building's original drawings. Though some classrooms have been carpeted since the school's construction, all originally feature the same vinyl tile and painted cinder block walls as the hallways. The library's shelving structure remains intact, though the actual shelves are no longer present. Original door hardware can be found throughout, including several brass door closers.

Accessed from the main lobby through several sets of doors, is the largest space in the building and contains the kitchen, cafeteria, and gymnasium. The gymnasium comes complete with a basketball hoop and stage and remains true to its original form. The kitchen and cafeteria are on one side of the space and the stage is set on the opposite side and is accessed by two sets of small stairs. Throughout the building, a drop ceiling was added at some point to accommodate electrical wiring and other utilities.

Home Economics Building (ca. 1935, contributing)

The former Home Economics Building, built in the mid-1930s, stands only a short physical distance from the primary structure, but is worlds away in terms of its construction and style. The wood-frame structure is two stories tall and features the steeply pitched roof and prominent front porch, made accessible with the addition of a ramp, that defines vernacular architecture in the area. Originally clad with wood, the building has been resided with aluminum but retains much of its original appearance and historic character. The building's first story contains four rooms, one of which is an enclosed porch modified on the interior to look like the inside of a log cabin.

Though no running water is present on site, the building is home to the Madison County Historical Society's Mountain Museum, honoring the individuals displaced to create Shenandoah National Park and showcasing an important part of our national story.

Agriculture Building (ca. 1935, contributing)

On the other side of the parking lot, another 1930s building speaks to the property's past and contributes to its historic significance. Originally intended as a facility for agriculture classes, the structure has had many lives including its recent use as the Criglersville voting precinct. Though the building's original wood siding has been covered with aluminum, the one-story schoolhouse's architectural character still emanates from the building, evident in the building's steeply pitched roofline, its two concrete covered porches, and original wood windows. Inside, the building is divided into three large classrooms, a porch-turned-hallway, and two small bathrooms.

Statement of Integrity

Despite nearly sixty years of continuous use and more than two decades of neglect, Criglersville Elementary School's primary structure is a prime candidate for historic preservation. With the exception of drop ceilings added to conceal electrical conduit, the removal of a bathroom above the kitchen, and the addition of a small wall in the upstairs hallways, the building remains substantially true to its original design.

Throughout the building, clear evidence of vandalism can be found in the form of graffiti and broken window panes, but nothing severe enough to preclude a preservationist approach to the school's restoration.

The Home Economics cabin was painstakingly renovated by the Madison County Historical Society in advance of the 2021 opening of the Mountain Museum. To help bring history to life on the site, the historical society enclosed the structure's side porch, installing salvaged chestnut timbers on the interior walls to create a "mountain kitchen" exhibit. Though the layout of the structure remains intact, non-original wood paneling – likely added in the 1970s – can be found through the building's first floor. On the building's exterior, the original wood weatherboard has been entombed behind aluminum siding, preventing further degradation but slightly altering the external appearance of the building.

Similar aluminum sheets can be found covering clapboard siding across the parking lot at the former agriculture building, which also remains largely true to its historic roots. Like the Mountain Museum, the structure's original plaster walls are hidden behind wood paneling, but the area's distinctive vernacular architecture still shines through.

Despite this alteration, many original features can still be found including chalkboards, chair rail, and heavy wooden doors that harken back to the building's original construction.

Criglersville School and its contributing outbuildings retain remarkable integrity. It remains at its original location and its surrounding setting has changed little, if at all, since the end of the period of significance. The exterior and interior retain most of original finishes and materials, except for the addition of dropped ceilings and carpet in some of the classrooms, so therefore the property retains integrity of materials. The building, still identifiable as a modernist, post-World War II school, retains integrity of association. The school's integrity of design is evident, with its more modern aesthetic that is easily recognizable in its form and massing, with its horizontality and utilitarian design that sets it apart from the design of school buildings constructed in the early 20th century.

Statement of Significance Summary Paragraph (Provide a summary paragraph that includes level of significance, applicable criteria, justification for the period of significance, and any applicable criteria considerations.)

Criglersville Elementary School is situated in the small town of Criglersville in rural northwest Madison County, approximately ten minutes north and west of the county seat of Madison. The school is locally significant under Criterion A in the area of Education and Criterion C in the area of Architecture. The period of significance for the property is ca. 1935 to 1974, beginning with the construction of the home economics and agriculture buildings, encompassing the construction of the new school in 1949 after the previous school building burned, and continuing to the 50-year cutoff to recognize the school's continued importance as an educational and community center for the for the village of Criglersville and the surrounding vicinity. Criglersville Elementary School continued operations until 2003, despite the increasing popularity of consolidating schools and busing students to more centralized locations. Under Criterion A (Education), the Criglersville school is significant as the longtime epicenter of educational life for this region of Madison County and the primary site of many Madisonians' academic development. It is also significant for its construction during a time when additional consolidation of schools in rural areas was encouraged by state and local officials. Under Criterion C (Architecture), the building is significant as a vernacular adaptation of institutional Modernist architecture in rural Madison County, a departure from the Colonial Revival influence that permeated school construction in years prior. The utilitarian brick school building remains one of the only such buildings in this area and stands in stark contrast to the surrounding agricultural landscape. The wood-frame support buildings, constructed in the 1930s in response to the Great Depression, exemplify the earlier architectural preference for designing educational buildings that were more akin to vernacular domestic architecture.

Criglersville Elementary School is significant for its role in the lives of residents and their children who were forced from their homes in communities that were in the path of what would become Shenandoah National Park. These community members made new lives for themselves in the area – an important story of struggle and resilience chronicled by the Mountain Museum, which now occupies the former home economics building. From its creation to its closure in 2003, the Criglersville Elementary School served as the area's key civic institution, hosting a long running and beloved "Harvest Dinner" and countless other local traditions and community events.

Narrative Statement of Significance (Provide at least one paragraph for each area of significance.)

Historical Background

The public school system in Virginia began with the 1869 Reconstruction Era state constitution, which mandated the first system of free public education and the construction of schools within walking distance of every student in the Commonwealth. With this mandate, rural counties like Madison began erecting one and two-room schoolhouses to meet the needs of students throughout their most remote communities. It is unknown how many schools were constructed in Madison after the mandate, but in an interview done by the Green County Record in 1959, Waverly Yowell, former superintendent of schools, noted that when he took office, there were 30 different schools throughout the county.

The first Madison County High School was constructed in 1916 along Schoolhouse Road near the Town of Madison. It burned in 1937, and a new Madison County High School was constructed in 1938. In 1913, Criglersville gained its first school. The original two-room schoolhouse was expanded to four rooms in 1921, when high school studies were incorporated. In 1924, consolidation of schools became popular, forcing the closure of many of the one- and two-room schoolhouses. With its proximity to the mountains, children living at higher elevations attended Criglersville, though a school was built in the mountains in 1930. The Criglersville School accepted students from a wide region as more of the one- and two-room schools, like the one in the community of Novum closed, and children were bused to Criglersville. The school saw its first graduation in 1925. The Civilian Conservation Corps Camp stationed at Quaker Run in 1934 also attended night classes in Forestry, Science, and Algebra at the Criglersville School.

Possibly in response to the Great Depression and the national trend of expanding subject areas and programs for students, the Agriculture and Home Economics buildings were constructed in the 1930s. Disaster struck the main building of Criglersville School in January 1946 when it was destroyed by fire. The school had housed both the high school and grade school, and students in grades 1 through 7 were sent to the former CCC Camp; high school students used the contributing Home Economics and Agriculture buildings, the Cannery, and the local Odd Fellows Hall.

After the fire, the Criglersville PTA requested an elementary school in lieu of a school that would house all grades. At the time of the fire, there were two high schools within the county, Criglersville and one in the Town of Madison. It was agreed that a new elementary school would be constructed in Criglersville, and high school age students would be sent to the school in Madison. The county received a loan from the State Board of Education for $152,000 for the new school. The new modern brick school was built in 1949 and opened with 265 white students. When Criglersville Elementary School closed in 2003, it had only 80 students.

Criglersville was chosen as one of eight Blue Ridge Heritage Memorial Sites for the Shenandoah National Park. The land for the park extends across eight counties and encompasses more than 33,000 acres in Madison County alone. With the creation of this park, residents of the mountain, so-called "mountain people," were forced from the land they had inhabited for generations, an act which would ultimately impact not only those individuals but surrounding communities. In Madison County alone, 125 families were displaced. The Mountain Museum in Criglersville is a tribute to those displaced, using its buildings to not only serve local residents, but for those beyond its boundaries.

Criterion A: Education

Criglersville Elementary School is locally significant under Criterion A in the area of Education for its history of providing educational opportunity in rural Madison County. The elementary school and each of the contributing buildings are representative of the evolving patterns of the education system in Madison County and the State of Virginia. Between its construction in 1949 and its closure in 2003, the primary building, Criglersville Elementary School, educated many generations of area residents and served as a center of civic life for the community.

After the original Criglersville School, which housed all grades, burned in 1946, the decision to rebuild a school that would only house elementary school grades reflects a statewide policy that students would be better served when the different grade levels were separated. The building's construction also reflects the influence of parents, via the Parent Teacher Association, as they pushed for a modern elementary school to be built in Criglersville rather than having their elementary aged students bussed to an elementary school in Madison, almost 10 miles away. This was rare victory for parents during a time when school consolidation was being promoted across the state.

Additionally, though they possessed considerable survival skills and intimate knowledge of the natural world, many of the residents evicted from Shenandoah National Park received limited formal education and struggled with low levels of literacy. In this context, Criglersville Elementary School played an essential role in the education of mountain children, ensuring they had the skills needed to navigate and thrive in the modern world.

Criterion C: Architecture

Criglersville Elementary School is architecturally significant in rural Madison County, embodying a vernacular form of the Modernist style that was commonly being adapted for institutions and other commercial buildings by the mid-20th century. At the time of its construction, it was one of the most modern and state-of-the art buildings in the county. Utilitarian in its design and ornamentation, the sturdy masonry building was built to last, serving as a school for more than half a century.

The school building was designed by Eubank & Caldwell, a prominent and prolific Roanoke-based architecture firm involved in the construction of numerous significant institutional and educational buildings across the region. Two schools by the firm have previously been listed on the Virginia Landmarks Register and National Register of Historic Places: William Byrd High School in the town of Vinton (NRIS SG100001082; NRHP 2017) and Warren County High School, a contributing building within the Front Royal Historic District (NRIS 03000209, NRHP 2002). Additionally, several institutional buildings designed by Eubank & Caldwell have also been listed, including the Salvation Army Citadel (NRIS SG100005429, NRHP 2020) and Gainsboro Library (NRIS 96001448, NRHP 1996) in Roanoke as well as the Beaux-Arts style YWCA building at 605 First Street SW in the Roanoke Downtown Historic District (NRIS 02000978, NRHP 2002). The firm also designed the Southwestern State Hospital Tubercular Building in the town of Marion (NRIS SG100009245, NRHP 2023). Significant commercial works by Eubank & Caldwell include the Hotel Lincoln (NRIS 95000897, NRHP 1995), the Lincoln Theatre (NRIS 92001710, NRHP 1992), and the Marion National Bank, all within the Marion Historic District (NRIS 00000888, NRHP 2000); the H.L. Lawson & Son Warehouse in Roanoke (NRIS 08000830, NRHP 2008); and the Grandin Theater, part of Roanoke's Grandin Road Commercial Historic District (NRIS 02001450, NRHP 2002).

The modern design of the school is reflective of changing national trends in the methods and materials used in school construction. The form and massing of schools became more utilitarian and minimalist in design, both on the exterior and interior. Materials like brick masonry, glass, and metal were applied to create buildings that prioritized function over design aesthetics. Criglersville Elementary School is a good example of this Modernist approach, with its horizontal massing and large aluminum casement windows that provide ample light to the classrooms in addition to adequate air flow. Glass block windows were also utilized and provide additional light in hallways. While brick is used on the exterior, concrete block is used on the interior. The architecture of Criglersville Elementary also stands out in its local context – as school consolidation gained popularity, smaller community schools were much more commonly replaced by larger, modern school in towns and cities, rather than more rural villages like Criglersville surrounded by open agricultural lands.

Only a few public schools remain in Madison County. One of earliest is Waverly Yowell Elementary School, constructed ca. 1938 as Madison County High School just north of the Town of Madison's small commercial core. Waverly Yowell embodies the Colonial Revival style, featuring a pedimented entry pavilion and Georgian Revival door surround with pilasters and broken pediment. In contrast, Criglersville Elementary represents a transition to a more streamlined and modern design and is likely one of the earliest examples of modern architecture to be constructed in the county. The design of its interior spaces, including a central gymnasium and cafeteria, are indicative of additional changes that were being implemented when designing new school buildings. Later school buildings constructed in the county are Madison High School, constructed in 1958, and William Wetsel Middle School, and Madison Primary School. Madison High School and the Middle School are more reflective of the International Style and represent a further evolution of architectural design for school buildings. Along with Waverly Yowell, these schools are all still in use and have continued to be updated and expanded. Criglersville Elementary School remains as one of the most intact historic school buildings in the region and one of the best examples of Post World War II Modernism in Madison County.

Constructed in the 1930s, the two contributing secondary resources on the site – the Home Economics and Agricultural buildings – stand out next to their more Modernist counterpart. The two buildings remain as representatives of earlier vernacular educational buildings constructed during the 1930s to accommodate changing curriculums and increases in student population. Even now, Criglersville Elementary School and its two secondary buildings remain one of the area's defining physical landmarks and a major source of community pride for longtime area residents.

Verbal Boundary Description (Describe the boundaries of the property.)

On three sides, the nomination boundary mirrors the historic parcel boundary. On its south side, it follows Old Blue Ridge Turnpike.

Boundary Justification (Explain why the boundaries were selected.)

Extending from the rear edge of the back ballfield to Old Blue Ridge Turnpike, the proposed nomination area covers all contributing resources associated with Criglersville Elementary School, including the primary structure and two outbuildings.
